Create a New Layer To get your work organized and ready for work, create a new empty layer. With every new layer, you create a new box to keep all of the layers you make for your project. You can also use tools to quickly duplicate an image. If you are just learning Photoshop, you'll start with a blank, white, empty layer.

What's New In?

One thing keeping people from diving into practice of kata is a lack of knowledge about how kata is supposed to be performed. When a student first begins to train in a dojo, they often do kata without really understanding why kata needs to be performed. They just memorize the movements and go forth without asking questions or performing kata for any other reason besides to imitate the movements they see in the movies. Do you have any ideas what mistakes other people did and/or might make? I can't think of a single person who will say they have not made a mistake with kata. I was pretty bad (let's say an nk, or non-kata as it were) in my early training. I remember things like practicing the movement of the "shimura" gedan barai, which is pretty much just the movement of kata itself. The first lesson where one of the senior students just began to break apart the movements, and say "you got this, and this, and this, and this, and this, and this" and only then did I realize the level of instruction I was missing in my training. When someone is break-up kata and tells you "you're good, lets go", I think that's the secret, right? When someone is break-up kata and tells you "you're good, lets go", I think that's the secret, right? It's called "a form of kata" and it's true, if you think about it, but the point I'm getting at is that after you've learned the terminology of kata, you can tailor your kata to match your "fit" or "style" in a way that you can't if you are trying to imitate kata without knowing why it is taught. Quote: I'll assume the point of my post was in direct response to the picture of blackkite (and not to you, because you're helping me improve). Indeed! Ha. I think that the difference in karate styles, or here the kata schools, is the use or to learn the movement as it was taught and there are no rules of how many repetitions to perform. In many cases, to get enough kata to learn the movement, the form "roast" could be performed many times. That's why there are so many kata to memorize.
