Severe hypophosphatemia, hypocalcemia and hypomagnesemia in elderly patients with acute pulmonary embolism treated with heparin and nadroparin. Hypophosphatemia, hypocalcemia, hypomagnesemia and coagulopathy are considered as potentially serious complications in patients with acute pulmonary embolism (PE) in the absence of advanced malignancies and anticoagulation. In a prospective observational study, we sought to evaluate the occurrence of these complications in elderly patients with PE. The study was performed in 38 patients with acute PE. After measuring serum electrolytes, ionized Ca⁺⁺, pH, ct, PT and APTT, all patients received UFH for anticoagulation. Nadroparin was administered at the first dose of 50 mg once a day in 27 patients and enoxaparin at the first dose of 6000 U twice a day in 11 patients. After treatment, serum electrolytes were evaluated daily for 5 days.

Acute PE was diagnosed in 36 patients (95.8%) and chronic in 2 (5.3%). In 14 (36.8%) patients, at least one electrolyte was significantly affected. Hypophosphatemia was diagnosed in 14 (36.8%) patients, hypocalcemia in 18 (47.4%) patients, hypomagnesemia in 13 (34.2%) patients and hypokalemia in 9 (23.7%) patients. Patients were given calcium, phosphate, magnesium and potassium after the diagnosis of electrolyte disorders. No differences were observed in the incidence of electrolyte disorders between patients treated with nadroparin and patients treated with UFH. Our study suggests a high incidence of severe electrolyte disorders in elderly patients with acute PE without advanced malignancy or anticoagulation. The occurrence of these disorders in PE may be attributable to the presence of hypovolemia and/or chronic obstructive pulmonary disease.
